One of the most important aspects of the New Deal was its agricultural policies. The Great Depression had devastated American farmers, and the New Deal sought to help them recover. The New Deal's agricultural policies were based on the ideas of agrarian intellectuals, a group of thinkers who believed that the nation's economic problems were rooted in the decline of rural America.

Agrarian intellectuals argued that the nation's farmers were being exploited by the industrialists and financiers who controlled the economy. They believed that the government needed to intervene to protect farmers and to help them regain their rightful place in American society.

The Agrarian Crisis

The Great Depression was a devastating blow to American farmers. Farm prices plummeted, and farmers were forced to sell their crops at a loss. Many farmers lost their land, and those who were able to keep their farms were often deeply in debt.

The agrarian crisis was caused by a number of factors, including the decline of the world market for agricultural products, the mechanization of agriculture, and the increasing concentration of agricultural production in the hands of a few large farms.

The agrarian crisis had a profound impact on American society. It led to widespread poverty and unemployment in rural areas. It also contributed to the rise of social unrest, and it helped to fuel the growth of the populist movement.
